THE JUNGIAN PSYCHOTHERAPISTS ASSOCIATION PRESENTS

The Perils of Wholeness

A seminar with

Ann Belford Ulanov, M.Div., Ph.D., L.H.D.

Jung is known for his concept of individuation, defined as the archetypal urge toward wholeness of personality, an urge described as the most ruthless in the psyche. This process is ruthless because we are driven to include all the parts of us, to go back to experience consciously what we may have survived but not integrated. This inclusion means we embark on a hunt for the missing parts: the lost ones, those rejected, and those we feared as too wonderful to receive. Often the parts hunt us, wanting to be included. The new ones then address us, summoning us here and now. This mix and match of our intentions and the intentions of the psyche leads to transition, even change. To consent brings the necessity of hope as well as surprise at the resilience of the psyche.

LEARNING PRINCIPLES

To renew understanding of Jung's concept of individuation as a psychic urge to include all the parts of us.

To explore what makes parts of us go missing from consciousness or never arrive there in the first place.

To identify types of missing parts that manifest in such experiences as chronic sorrow, bodily afflictions, confusion about one's place in reality or what one trusts as true.

To address archetypal levels of psyche and imagination that aid in finding and including these missing parts.

To describe a quality of consciousness which grows in individuation processes and deepens relations to others and society's possibility of community.
